Leading To Trouble

You see it all the time. But, did you know that casually leading a horse improperly can lead to death? I don't mean to be sensational. It's true. I know two people who have been killed by leading in the latest fashion: with the end of the lead rope tossed over the person's left shoulder while the person walks in front of the horse. In each case, the quiet horse spooked. The lead rope hooked and hurled the person, breaking their neck.

Another seasonal favorite practice is to hold a grazing horse with a lead shank folded back on itself. The horse grazes and stomps at flies. When the hoof sneaks into the chain loop, the horse can break a neck or leg.

Proper leading involves both your body position and organization of the lead rope. Here are some tips for keeping safe.

Your Body Position

- Always walk at the horse's shoulder. You may need to get your horse accustomed to walking next to you. Initially, cluck and use the end of the lead to scoot him up from behind. Then, build good habits.
- Keep one eye on the horse. The reason you walk at the horse's shoulder is to troubleshoot. There, you can be aware of his concerns and have better leverage to handle problems. If the horse is behind you, it is impossible to anticipate or respond to danger in time. So, stay at the shoulder with one eye on the horse's ear, which will tell you what he is focusing on. Sometimes averting accidents is as simple as diverting his attention back to you, perhaps by speaking and jiggling the lead.

- If you lead from behind the shoulder, you lose leverage.

That is why heels are important: If the horse is getting away from you, dig your heels into the ground. Another way to regain control is with a handy muscle twitch. If you grab the muscle on the neck, just above the point of the shoulder, the horse will suck back. If he is getting away from you, grab the muscle. You can twist it for added impact if necessary. Without needing strength, this technique allows you to regain control, his attention and his respect instantly. Try that twitch. It works as a great eject button when the horse is standing on your foot as well.

Managing The Lead

- Use two hands. Your right hand should hold the lead a foot below the halter. Your left hand should hold the extra length. If the horse spooks, that second hand is your backup.

- Never wrap. If you wrap the lead around your hand and he bolts, it can tear your fingers off. No joke. Always fold your lead and hold around it – not with your fingers through the center.
